What makes people most happy?

Based on the results from the survey, it shows various aspects toward what facets make people happy. Achievement at work accounts for the highest portion of the category among different ages (at) 31% and 32% respectively. Doing hobbies, accounting for 22% and 24%. As for having a good appearance and Travelling, indicating a slightly lower interest amongst people under 30. Lastly, financial security and being with family are less paramount among people over 30.

As far as I am concerned, feeling a sense of achievement at our work can have significant impact on our working efficiency. To illustrate, achieving on work can greater help enhance our performance and working satisfaction in order to improve our productivity and efficiency, making sure we won't feel like doing a monotonous chore. As for doing hobbies, it provides numerous opportunities for exploring and learning new skills. By integrating hobbies into our lives, not only can we foster our various abilities, but we can also feel a sense of fulfillment. Lastly, although travelling can gain our real-world experience^{and}, broaden our horizon, the limited budget often deter people from having a trip, especially for individuals under 30, ^{still} facing the difficulties about their financial security.

All in all, though the diagrams showcase achievement at work and doing hobbies are the primary way of getting happiness, it doesn't represent the whole. Ultimately, finding the way that truly makes you happy is the most important of all.
